CompanyofHeroesNewSteamVersionv27000The Viphoid: a new cervical ultrasound scanner with a new scan head design. This study was designed to evaluate a new cervical transducer in vitro and in vivo, the Viphoid (GE Healthcare, Nutfield, CT, USA). In vitro: To assess the image quality, and its ability to depict a target of known dimensions, a phantom with a stainless-steel cylinder of variable diameter and wall thickness was scanned with the Viphoid system. In vivo: To evaluate the ability to screen for cervical stenoses, carotid-artery intima-media thickness (IMT) was determined by measuring the maximum IMT at the right common carotid artery (CCA) in 200 normal individuals. For the in vitro evaluation, 22 images of the phantom were obtained during and after placement in water. Transducer stability was evaluated by measuring the pulse pressure of the ultrasound wave over 15 s at a depth of 2 cm in a 10% gel. In vivo, carotid IMT was measured at the right CCA in 200 healthy people, and 50 were selected for a repeat carotid IMT measurement at 6 months.
